PREFATORY SYNOPSIS

The Town of Morrison was incorporated on January 10, 1906, as a statutory town. Its basic structure and legal status have not changed during its first century of existence. Physically the Town has changed somewhat, but broad and pervasive change, resulting from growth and growth pressure in and around the historic town, is just now beginning to be felt. The Morrison Home Rule Commission, elected on April 4, 2000 has designed and presented a Charter which makes minimal modification to the current structure and practice of government in the Town, but empowers the Town to effectively function in its second century. The Charter reserves to the residents of the Town and their elected officials the fullest power and authority over local and municipal matters that may be reserved under Article XX of the Colorado Constitution. The Charter and the administrative structure provided will enable the Town to respond quickly and effectively to the challenges the future will present:

- intensified regulation of the water and sewer utilities.
- new state or federal mandates
- changes in the law governing municipal matters as a result of legislative or citizen initiated changes.
- development and development pressure.

The Charter authorizes but does not require the position of Town Administrator. As government becomes a more technical and complex activity skilled management with continuity is important..

The Charter presented to the Board of Trustees retains, and in some cases expands, the rights of the electorate to be informed about and to effect the government of the Town through broader notice requirements for Board meetings and proposed ordinances, a detailed budget document and open budget process with opportunity for citizen participation and the rights of initiative, referendum and recall. The Charter leaves unimpaired the right of a citizen to vote upon any proposed tax increase or change, any new tax and any new debt payable over multiple years representing a general obligation of the Town. The Charter encourages responsible long range planning through a requirement for a capital improvement program and regular utility rate review. The Charter provides for an independent annual audit of the Town's financial status so that citizens may inform themselves of the Town's financial condition.

It is the Charter Commission's belief that that level of government closest to the people best understands their needs and is most responsive to their requests and should therefore have the greatest authority to develop policy affecting them. Preserving that authority is the essence of home rule and the purpose and intent of the proposed Morrison Home Rule Charter.
